The protector of

Democracy in Government

"A popular government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce, or a tragedy; or, perhaps both.

Knowledge will forever govern ignorance; and a people who mean to be their own governors must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives."

--James Madison

4th President of the United States

The Commission on Public Records was created by Public Law 1035, chapter 219, on 11 March 1935. The Indiana General Assembly expanded and modified the Commission's organization and responsibilities in 1961, 1971, 1979, and 1983.

The Commission became an independent state agency in 1979, and now consists of eight divisions: Forms Management, Records Management, State Records Center, State Archives, Micrographics, and the Conservation Lab, thereby completing the life cycle of information and records. Together with the administrative and fiscal divisions, these divisions create, manage, distribute, and preserve the information of the State of Indiana through efficient and fiscally responsible policies and procedures.

The life of all information record keeping begins with a well-designed form (Forms Management) which after distribution and use becomes a record. This record is then destined, through a retention schedule (Records Management), for ultimate destruction or preservation. Depending on the retention schedule, the record can be stored temporarily and then destroyed (State Records Center), or it can be preserved permanently as an historic record (State Archives). Some important records are microfilmed (Micrographics), or are restored and/or repaired (Conservation Lab).

The Oversight Committee on Public Records functions as the policy-making body for the Commission, and consists of the Governor, the Secretary of State, the State Examiner for the State Board of Accounts, the Director of the State Library, the Director of the Historical Bureau, the Director of the Commission on Public Records, the Commissioner of the Department of Administration, the Public Access Counselor, and two lay members appointed by the Governor for four-year terms.

Since safeguarding public information is a vital function of government, the Commission's role in the administration of records is to reduce paperwork, preserve Indiana's history, and improve the efficient operation of state government.
